Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from John Randolph: Abroad and at Home On his first arrival in London, all eyes were struck with his figure in the streets. The human form from all parts of the globe was to be seen there, but nothing like his. It seemed to belong to a class by itself; long, lean, and loose jointed - a withered face, a shrunken body, and the whole expression peculiar and startling. Many who passed him turned round to take another look. How mysterious exclaimed one, how outlandish another - a term to which the English are addicted. His complexion was death-like. Sometimes he moved about on foot, and sometimes rode a pony. When saluting people, his voice would mount up to a high, shrill, key, as if he were hallooing. The particulars of his dress were obscured by a long cloak, which, in one respect, claimed resemblance to the doublet of Gaffer Gray - it was not very new.
